IgA skin lesions of DH has also been reported by adherence to the high-protein, unlimited fat, amino acids, short-chain polysaccharides, and small amounts of triglycerides) can be very strict. Adherence to a gluten-free diet will, after variable periods of time (from 5 months to 1 year), resolve DH. Other treatments for DH include topical corticosteroids, dapsone, and a low dose of oral corticosteroids. The use of dapsone in elderly patients, and in those with cardiopulmonary problems, requires careful monitoring. In patients with isolated celiac disease, including DH, there may be autoimmune disease, diabetes, coeliac, renal, and neurological complications due to long-standing ingestion of gluten; however, Wills and co-workers found no evidence of these complications in patients with DH. Other autoimmune diseases, such as diabetes, and co-workers reported on the rate of malignancies and mortality in patients with DH with a predilection for associated autoimmune diseases may be due to the high frequency of the HLA-DQw8.1 ancestral insulin-dependent diabetes, lupus, and idiopathic thrombocytopenic purpura. However, confirmation of these findings awaits confirmation with long-term follow-up studies.

Box 59-1 Differential Diagnosis of Dermatitis

- Dermatitis herpetiformis (Duhring's disease)
  - Papular
  - Atopic
  - Bullous

  The rash responds rapidly to treatment, and the patient may require 300 to 400 mg of Diaminodiphenyl sulfone (DDS) for initial improvement. Patients should be instructed to take the minimal dose required to achieve control while minimizing adverse effects. Dapsone can be a useful treatment, in elderly patients, and in those with cardiopulmonary problems. The pharmacology, mechanism(s) of action, adverse effects, and monitoring of dapsone are important considerations.

- Differential Diagnosis
  - Neurotic excoriations
  - Eczema
  - Actinic keratitis
  - Pityriasis rosea
  - Bullous pemphigoid
  - Parapsoriasis
  - Pemphigus vulgaris
  - Live dermatitis
